

Ness: instant hot water thanks to a device that reduces the bill up to a 40%

LOCATION: Málaga

DURATION: 1'29"

SUMMARY: Ness is a device developed by a company in Málaga, Métrica 6, to save water. It makes hot water run since the moment we open the tap, so we can use it immediately. This system permits saving 800 litres a month per person and reduces the water bill up to a 40%.

VTR:

This is a usual picture in every home. We waste water since the moment we open the tap until the water acquires the temperature we desire. This device, invented by a new company in Málaga, avoids this.

Juan Francisco Cáliz
Marketing Responsible Métrica 6

"A home can save up to a 40% in the water bill, an average of up to 800 litres per person a month."

The Ness device heats the water before it comes out of the tap; it is electronic and works with every type of furnaces. A switch is what makes it work.

José Manuel Díaz
Product Development Métrica 6

"Turning it into a new light switch that has two functions: one of them is making the system work and the other is alerting us when the water reaches the right temperature."

The change of light alerts us when the water is hot. It has been designed to be installed during the construction of the house.

Samuel Tirado
Corporate representation
Métrica 6

"The first version is aimed at housing units under construction or at those where they are willing to get a small house makeover."

Their short term objectives: are improving the design, the implementation in community buildings and hotels and its commercialization.

Eduardo Dueñas
Executive Director Métrica 6

"Commercialization at a national level. We want to distribute Ness at a national level and also to improve the part destined for use by final costumers with a finer aesthetic design."

They have gone beyond the Spanish market and have received orders from around the world, from countries such as Germany, Canada, Morocco or the United Arab Emirates.
